Neural cells in the CNS, such as neurons, astrocytes and microglia, are the principal cells of the nervous system and are responsible for a wide variety of physiological functions such as motor function, sensory functions, and cognitive functions. Neurodegenerative diseases and brain disorders in the central nervous system are characterized by degeneration or loss of neural cells. Neurodegenerative diseases and brain disorders of the central nervous system include, for example, Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's disease, Huntington's disease, spinal cerebellar ataxia, multiple sclerosis, and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS). The pathophysiological conditions of neurodegenerative diseases and brain disorders of the central nervous system are related to genetic, biochemical and pathological changes. Among them, aberrant protein aggregation is known to play an important role. It has been shown that various protein aggregates are involved in the process of neurodegeneration, and various drugs, which can prevent protein aggregation, have been developed and are useful for the treatment of neurodegenerative diseases and brain disorders. Proteins are highly polar molecules, and their hydrophobic protein moieties are located in the interior of the molecules. However, proteins need to interact with cell membranes and with the extracellular matrix for their physiological functions. It is known that proteins have an affinity for hydrophobic substances such as cell membranes and the extracellular matrix, and that the extracellular matrix is a complex structure that is not a simple, homogenous, water-insoluble substance. Two distinct types of protein-protein interaction can be present in the proteins that interact with the cell membrane. One of them is a hydrophobic-hydrophobic interaction. The other is a hydrophilic-hydrophilic interaction. The hydrophobic-hydrophobic interaction involves a hydrophobic group such as a protein side chain on the one protein and a hydrophobic substance such as a phospholipid head group on the other protein. The hydrophilic-hydrophilic interaction, on the other hand, involves a hydrophilic group such as a protein side chain on one protein and a hydrophilic
